Sean Encarnacion It's an old question of age: Do you rather have the super power of flying or invisibility? Personally, I would go with invisibility, but I can't teach a very long lesson on how to portray invisible superheroes. Therefore, here we will teach you how to draw a flying cap hero soaring in the sky. Drawing cartoon superheroes is always fun, but sometimes it's fun to draw heroes who look like cartoons. That's the direction we're in today. First, let's draw a red line running in the picture. It's our line of action and helps us build our characters in the right flow. For an interesting point of view, we need to draw something like a kidney bean shape for his body. We draw a circle for his head and then the chin. Finally, draw a triangle bent down to make his hips. Draw each arm in four parts: shoulder, upper and lower arms and hands. Note how I drew the overlapping parts of each other on his right side. Draw each shoulder over the edge of the bean shape. Take the time to draw your fingers and hands. Draw your hands very large to show them that they are coming towards the viewer. If you notice, it's about the same size as the bean shape you drew for your body. Draw each leg in three parts. You can draw the foot as a right triangle and round the edges. It is important to draw your feet small to make them look far away. Still make sure to draw some big curves on his calf to show his powerful muscles. Unless he's the hero of the Hulk or things or some other whimsical monster, chances are your hero will look good. We draw our heroes with classic good looks. Follow the lines drawn through his face to balance his facial features. Draw his eyes wide and expressive to give him that cartoony feel. Draw a mask and change the design of the mask if necessary. The cape reacts to gravity. When you draw clothes, the folds will react to two things: gravity and body parts pull it up or squeeze them together. Most of his clothes have tight skin, so they don't respond much to gravity. But Cape must be drawn as the force of his flight is through the air and dragging it against the force of gravity. At this stage of our lesson, if you wish, break away and get creative on your own. You can skip capes and masks, or you can draw crazy combinations. Have fun designing your own character on top of this one. Congratulations! You have finished drawing superheroes. Choose the color you like as you fill him out. Perhaps you want to change his ethnicity by changing his hair or skin color, or his hairstyle too. I know there are no fun, wrong answers to draw your character.
